Description

Pair of Early Victorian Graduated Silver-Plate Serving Dishes by Fitting, Copeland, White & Baker

A handsome pair of early Victorian silver-plate serving dishes by Fitting, Copeland, White & Baker, presented in graduated oval sizes. Elegant in form and richly reflective, they offer a refined example of 19th-century tableware, designed to bring both practicality and ceremony to the dining table.

Each dish is finely shaped with a gently raised rim, creating a restrained yet decorative profile that complements both traditional and contemporary interiors. The graduated proportions allow them to be displayed together with pleasing visual balance, while also making them practical for serving different courses, side dishes, vegetables, or sweets. Their oval form is especially versatile, lending itself beautifully to a formal dining setting, sideboard, or buffet table.

Produced during the early Victorian period, the pair reflects the growing popularity of silver-plated wares among households wishing to enjoy the elegance of silver at the table. The quality and weight of the pieces, together with their understated design, give them a timeless appeal that is as relevant for entertaining today as it was in the 19th century.

Whether used as intended or displayed as decorative objects, these serving dishes would make a distinguished addition to a dining room, kitchen, or collection of antique silver plate. A charming and useful pair, combining period character, graceful proportion, and enduring functionality.
